Deeper Roots: A 30 Day Devotional Journal

Through the close-up. For all its capacity for cognitive discovery, a rehearsal-based notion of performance as individual or collective speculation through practice must also contend with the inseparability of experience from the discourse that frames it, to recall Joan Scott's work Here I draw on Judith Butler's concept of the "compulsory citationality" of cultural discourse that forces one to "quote" or repeat it, even as these reiterations can generate change through new, unexpected meanings, or what she calls the "unanticipated resignifications" of "highly contested terms" "Critically Queer," 23, Although unlike Butler I underscore the active choices women writers made and the periodic new meanings with which they invested the discourses framing their experience, like Butler I show that their options were not unencumbered as to which public identity from the available repertoire they might perform in any given setting.
