Ribera's male saints, ascetics, and apostles have grown old and leather-skinned in the harsh sun of Naples; the torturers in his martyrdom scenes have learned their trade in the local butcher shops and go about their grisly business with the disconcerting air of tradesmen inured through long practice; his young virgins, though hardly plebeian, are those dark-eyed, dark-haired beauties that can still be encountered, on occasion, in the narrow alleys of the city; his shoddily clad ancient philosophers - Plato, Aristotle, Democritus - profess the pragmatic wisdom born of a life of hardship, not the abstract, professorial learning of the academy; and the gods of his mythologies seem long ago to have abandoned the regal splendor of Olympus for the less certain but more gratifying pleasures of the capital of Parthenope. Thirteen came out today, sixteen yesterday, and ninety-two last week.
